The Magic Pencil Curriculum Guide was prepared to accompany the engagingly didactic novel for youth, The Magic Pencil. "TMP" is the only book discussing African American English and code-switching from a young person's view point. The Magic Pencil is both a mirror book as well as a window book. It's purpose is to uplift and inspire youth toward greater literacy by letting them see themselves and their peers in literature. This Guide will help the instructor introduce the book almost immediately once she has it in her hands! It summarizes each chapter with teaching suggestions and stimulating questions following. OBJECTIVES • To encourage the uninspired, reluctant and discouraged reader to develop the desire to read for pleasure. • To develop the desire to read for greater knowledge. • To increase self-esteem; especially within African American/black youth. • To remove the stigma applied to African American/black people when they use colloquial language. To recognize all people engage in this behavior. To understand that there are special and new words used when one is a part of a particular group (the language among computer technicians, for example) which may or may not become known among the general population. • To increase vocabulary by creating a desire to know exactly what a particular word means and how it relates to what is occurring. • To demonstrate the opportunities available by learning how to effectively navigate unfamiliar territory not just through "traditional" education. • To honor the "first/home/community" language of the speaker and to realize s/he is articulate within that language. To, thereby, foster a willingness in the person to adopt other ways of speaking while retaining his or her present mode of speech -- if desired and needed. • To become respectful and tolerant of the differences in others. To focus on the commonalities between self and others. • To foster self-respect, self-determination and self-reliance. • To learn how to constructively debate over preferences and beliefs. • To learn to be empathetic towards another's problems. • To work together for the greater good. • To feel hopeful about the future. You will understand what the author's intentions are and will be able to mold them into what is best for your learners. Most would agree that the concept of failing schools and failing children is not an acceptable one. The authors of this series conducted research pertaining to causal factors of poor student academic performance and found that the primary cause is attributable to instructional gaps. The result of their research and work was a proven method of increasing student performance on summative and formative assessments, implemented in numerous schools and districts across the country. In each instance student performance increased exponentially, with more than 70% of the schools realizing stellar increases when following this system. Keeping it Real is a series capturing essential elements of this system and is designed to provide teachers, principals and curriculum specialists with the tools to improve student academic performance in all content areas. More importantly, however, it eliminates the guesswork associated with curriculum alignment and ensures that key standards are emphasized and assessed. In keeping with the multifaceted nature of the subject, multiple perspectives, among them political science, philosophy, religious studies, sociology, and anthropology, are fully represented in this indispensable resource.
