Case Studies in Abnormal Psychology presents a broad range of cases drawn from the clinical experience of authors Kenneth N. Levy, Kristen M. Kelly, and William J. Ray to take readers beyond theory into real-life situations. The authors take a holistic approach by including multiple perspectives and considerations, apart from those of just the patient. Each chapter follows a consistent format: Presenting Problems and Client Description; Diagnosis and Case Formulation; Course of Treatment; Outcome and Prognosis/Treatment Follow-up; and Discussion Questions. Providing empirically supported treatments and long-term follow-up in many case studies gives students a deeper understanding of each psychopathology and the effects of treatment over time. Excerpt from The Journal of Abnormal and Social Psychology, Vol. 2: 1907-1908 Cerebral anesthesia, the reality and importance of which in the mechanism of the emotions I have endeavored to show, is still contested and rejected by the majority of authors. Notwithstanding this the facts which militate in its favor are sufficiently numerous to impel me to call attention to certain ones which are observable in the great majority of cases at the onset or, at times, at the moment of disappearance of more or less profound troubles of the personality. It is almost fifteen years since I first observed them. They consist in general in quite a sudden sensation of shock, of cerebral cataclysm. Certain patients compare it to an explosion in the brain, or it seems to them as if the brain turned upon itself; others describe it as a cracking or bursting sensation, after which they feel themselves transformed, changed; and the outside world appears to them in another aspect, giving them a different impression. These sensations provoke in the victim a profound astonishment, a sort of stupefaction and not seldom an extreme anxiety. It seems to him as though everything were escaping from him, vanishing, and that he can't even hold onto himself. The first case of the sort observed by me was that of a man about fifty years of age who experienced a sudden shock in the head, which came upon him in the wake of a considerable intellectual and moral over-tire in business. Excerpt from The Journal of Abnormal Psychology, Vol. 7: April-May, 1912 The subject dreamed that he was in a dark cave full of water; it had two openings, side by side. Opposite to him was a puppy whining to come out. Coming behind the puppy were two cats. He set out to rescue the puppy, which during the procedure seemed to fuse into his personality. He was in great danger of drowning, but clung to some bushes which were at the side of the cave, and at last safely emerged. Standing outside was his father, who was quite unconcerned. He wondered that his father had not helped him, and supposed it was because he had not realized the extent of the danger. He impressed on his father the danger he had come through, and boastfully told him that he had saved himself without any help. Excerpt from The Journal of Abnormal Psychology, 1917-1918, Vol. 12 One morning after this incident when I made my ward rounds I found her standing before a window, very much embarrassed. Her body muscles were jerking vigorously and she explained when I approached that she hated that man more than any one in the world. She referred to the physician that made the ear puncture, whom she had just seen pass by the building. She could not explain why she hated him. He had not hurt her and had been kind and careful she said, but nevertheless when she saw him she felt an intense hatred for him. Excerpt from The Journal of Abnormal Psychology, Vol. 3: April-May, 1908 Rom the very earliest times man wondered about sleep and attempted some explanation of it. It was supposed that in sleep the soul wanders away from the body and leaves it in a lifeless condition. Many of the savage tribes are on that account afraid to waken people lest the soul may be frightened away and not return at all to the body. That is why even at present we often hear the saying that sleep is the companion of death. On the other hand death is Often described as sleep. On the same basis dreams were explained by the primitive mind, the soul in sleep leaves the body and wanders away; on its wanderings the soul meets with all kinds of adventures and it is such experience that gives rise to dreams. In sleep the wandering soul, not encumbered by the gross body, can visit great distances in a short time and can even communicate with heavenly powers, with angels and gods.
