A field test was conducted to examine the efficiency of a paper-and-pencil television diary for collecting viewer evaluations of public and commercial television programs. Six hundred individuals in Boston, Massachusetts, kept qualitative viewing diaries for one week. The results indicated high and enthusiastic cooperation by the total sample. The diary was determined to be easy and convenient to use, with acceptably low nonresponse rates on each of the four qualitative scales used to evaluate programs. The resulting profile for public television lent credence to the notion that public television programs cannot and need not be evaluated solely on the basis of audience size. In addition, the data collected proved highly relevant to program development, scheduling, promotion, and evaluation, both for the local Boston station and for stations at the national level. Sample pages from the diary are appended. By this third episode, we regular viewers were accustomed to the familiar, rather than professional, the relationship of J.R. and his secretary, Julie. J.R. had hired a secretary for Bobby who was the opposite of his girl-Friday. Bobby's first secretary was rather, shall we say, mature and plain. In this episode, we saw Bobby had made his own choice of an assistant. What was the young woman's name sitting outside Bobby's office? The men from Waco made their way to Southfork and even managed to get inside the house. They introduced themselves as Peyton Allen and Luther Frick. While Frick made the telephone call to report their (supposed) stalled pickup truck, what did Allen offer to do for the women? A mumbling, bumbling, stumbling J.R. joined Pamela in the hayloft of the stables but she wanted no part of his advances. Backing away from J.R., Pam fell from the loft to a lower level. Later back at the ranch we learned from Bobby the result of that fall.
